EPR also appears to be the method of choice for measuring radiation dose retrospectively, including the potential to do this in vivo in human subjects. While far from comprehensive, the reviews, original contributions and viewpoints provided in this issue by several leaders in the field of in vivo EPR should provide the readers with confirmation that in vivo EPR is an exciting field that is

The use of human hair as biodosimeter ScienceDirect

The origin of the EPR spectra of background human hair is known mainly due to the presence of melanin which is a pigment that determines the color of both human skin and hair (Commoner et al., 1954, Swartz et al., 1972).
