Individual Differences in Posttraumatic Response Problems

This book challenges the assumptions of the event-dominated DSM model of posttraumatic stress disorder. Bowmam examines a series of questions directed at the current mental health model, reviewing the empirical literature. She finds that the dose-response assumptions are not supported; the severity

The Darkness Within Individual Differences in Stress

My hypotheses are that individual differences in stress vulnerability and resilience are key determinants of the development of posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and addiction, and these differences derive from the neurocircuitry of our emotional dark side. I'll take you through this neurocircuitry to explain what I mean.
