Government control of the Internet Slaw

Governments are getting smarter about control in such circumstances, and perhaps more ruthless. The Syrian government opened the country for the first time to Twitter and Facebook in 2011. However, it turned out that the government was able to track the signals and the computers used by anyone sending critical messages, so the Internet was used to find dissidents.

Should the government control the internet Debate org

Government control of the internet would allow the government to determine what content users may access. Any blocking or prohibiting of accessing sites is arguably censorship. Also, since the internet is not a government entity nor essential to the core function of the government, the government has not right to take control of the internet.
