In this graduate-level course, we will be covering advanced topics in combinatorial optimization. We will start with non-bipartite matchings and cover many results extending the fundamental results of matchings, flows and matroids. The emphasis is on the derivation of purely combinatorial results, including min-max relations, and not so much on

It is based on numerous courses on combinatorial optimization and specialized topics, mostly at graduate level. This book reviews the fundamentals, covers the classical topics (paths, flows, matching, matroids, NP-completeness, approximation algorithms) in detail, and proceeds to advanced and recent topics, some of which have not appeared in a textbook before. Throughout, it contains complete combinatorial nature of routing and scheduling problems suggests, at least in principle, that almost every vehicle planning problem can be formulated and solved as an integer programming problem. And yet, very few studies document the use of optimization algorithms of an integer programming variety for these problems. Instead, historically, when confronted with vehicle fleet planning problems
